This is Sarah, talking about using Learnworlds in 2020, almost four years before we did. Of course, this got nowhere. Even her one attempt that she did put some effort into -- Google Classroom -- never really got finished. and it proved to be practically unusable anyway.

Hi Vinny,

As I just mentioned it while we talked this evening, I'm sharing this email with you for your information.

I like the idea.

As Jonathan's comments on the class show, there may be too much of info at once and perhaps people are not absorbing it. Even with a 2 hour in person class, people were still amazingly uninformed.

I'm happy to investigate with you.

Hi,

This is a placeholder email really! But I want to at least put this out there to see if anyone is interested or has an idea for anyone else who works on our BBC Class that might also be interested.

After doing some light research, I'd like to plan on trying an online teaching platform perhaps between Jan-March 2021.

Two frontrunner candidates I'm interested in would be Learnworlds and Teachable.

We'd break our course into modules, upload videos, create graded tests and set up the BBC Class to be something anyone can take online at their own pace and their own time. Our educators would spend time improving the materials, not teaching live as much. When in person classes resume, we'd still be able to offer an online option to help our education mission reach more people.

It might impact how we want the rest of their adoption process to go, but I think we should seriously consider this as an approach to make our teaching scalable and sustainable given the jump in interest this year.

If you're interested in looking at this with me when it happens, let me know! Or feel free to nominate anyone else you think could be a good help!

Sarah.
